Design for America teaches participants to act quickly and understand the importance of empathizing with others to create social impact. Participants run through a rapid introduction to the steps in the human centered design process by introducing a local challenge, empathizing with different stakeholders involved, and rapidly brainstorming and building ideas that address the challenge. Then participants think about how they can bring the process out into the community to truly understand user needs and generate solutions that create a real impact.

This is a two-hour workshop with Virginia Tech students and a professional facilitator.
